

Above: Rhino Bumpers somehow manage to be cool, discreet and purposeful at the same time. They're also strong as an ox – the days when the only answer was to bolt up something that looked like a five-bar gate are happily long gone. This one provides a home for a Warn Zeon S10

Below: A neat feature of the bumpers at both ends of the vehicle are that they manage to look close to standard – while being umpteen times stronger. This is a Summit unit from ARB, and it sets the vehicle off beautifully while providing the sort of protection, and a recovery point, anything with such a long overhang is sure to need

Rival's underbody protection kits have become increasingly popular over the last couple of years or so, especially on pick-up builds, and Andy's Ranger wears a full set of 6mm aluminium plates stretching just about its entire length. There's another kind of protection going on under here, too – to help keep it strong and sturdy in the face of a tough life, the chassis received the full Dinitrol wax treatment
